I'm not a huge party animal, so when I came across the bar/restaurant name 'NEIGHBOURHOOD,' its appeal said something about close friends, small towns and cosy environments. You arrive at a discreet doorway on the street, get past the big guy but friendly guy at the door, and up an old staircase. You're immediately into the vibe with a young avant-garde crowd chatting at the bar about everything from the latest rock band to the interesting items set into the resin bar counter.

There's a homely old world charm about this place. It even has its own authentic book library which looks like it's been there for years. The lighting is soft and easy on the eye so it's quite easy to relax in grandma's couch in the corner with a stiff cocktail & some Chillipoppers and take in the atmosphere.

On the other hand, if you're into a little more energy for the night, you could hang out with friends around the pool table until your name hurts. There's also a restaurant with good service if you're feeling a little peckish.

The balcony is also a great feature because it overlooks Long Street, one of the vibiest streets in town and there's always a bit of action going on to take your attention away from the pretty waitress serving you...Mmm... maybe that's a good thing if you're with the missus.
